Places Aspect of Skagway with sail ships Skagway with sail ships, 2009 Dawson City declined as the godsend. When journalist Laura Berton (future wife of Pierre Berton) arrived in Dawson in 1907 it was soundless flourishing, merely aside from Front Street, the town had gone increasingly deserted, jam-packed, as she wrote it, "with the refuse of the godsend: stoves, articles of furniture, gold-pans, sets of dishes, double-belled carbonated water bottles ... hemorrhoid of rusting excavation machinery—boilers, winches, wheelbarrows and pumps".^[315] By 1912, only roughly 2,000 inhabitants remained compared to the 30,000 of the gold rush days and the situation was seemingly a spectral town.^[316] By 1972, 500 people were active in Dawson whereas the nearby settlements created during the gold rush had been completely relinquished.^[317] The town has fully grown since the 1970s, with 1,300 recorded in 2006.^[318] During the gold rush, transport improvements meant that heavier mining equipment could be brought in and larger, additional advanced mines conventional in the Klondike, revolutionising the mining industry.^[319]^[320] Gold output increased until 1903 as a result of the dredging and hydraulic excavation but declined; by 2005, close to 1,250,000 pounds (570,000 kg) had been recovered from the Klondike area.^[319]^[320]^[321] In the 21st century Dawson City still has a small golden excavation industry, which together with tourism, draws on the legacy of the boom, playing a part in the local economy. Many buildings in the center of the town are a testament to the expressive style of the era.^[322] Klondike River valley is named by the godsend by the hard dredging that occurred later.^[323]
